Hawaii bill would classify homelessness as medical condition

February 2, 2017

By Valerie A. Canady

A bill that would classify homelessness as a health problem and require insurers to provide coverage for the treatment of homelessness is currently under consideration in the Hawaii state legislature. The sponsor of the legislation wants to cure homelessness with housing by redirecting some of the state's $2 billion annual Medicaid budget to pay for it.

According to news reports, Hawaii had the highest rate of homelessness of all U.S. states in 2015, with 53 homeless people for every 10,000 residents, according to the National Alliance to End Homelessness.

The Hawaii legislation, SB 2, specifies that "each individual or group accident and health or sickness insurance policy issued or renewed in this state after Jan. 1, 2018, shall provide to the policyholder coverage for the treatment of homelessness."

The bill may be the first of its type introduced nationally. "I've not heard of any legislature of this kind," Senator Josh Green, M.D., sponsor of the bill, told MHW. People are often struggling with a mental illness or drug addiction or regular health challenge because they're homeless, said Green. "Sometimes homelessness accompanies these issues and sometimes it's made worse by it," said Green, an emergency room doctor. "I've been able to take care of a lot of people that are homeless."
